

Administration and Economy in the Late Roman Empire

Prepared by D. Whitfield

Imperial Reform

The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The legions stationed on the Rhine frontier were repeatedly drawn into succession disputes. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested.

Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres.

Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries.

The Provincial Economy

Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters.

The legions stationed on the Rhine frontier were repeatedly drawn into succession disputes. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office.

Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters.

Sources and Evidence

Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries.

The silver content of the denarius declined steadily through the third century crisis. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Late antique tax registers reveal a countryside more resilient than earlier narratives suggested. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries.