

Working Paper: Coinage Debasement in the Third Century

Prepared by Various Authors

Abstract

The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Urban magistrates financed public games as a route to higher office. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters.

Discussion

The legions stationed on the Rhine frontier were repeatedly drawn into succession disputes. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. The reforms of Diocletian divided imperial administration into eastern and western spheres. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries.

The legions stationed on the Rhine frontier were repeatedly drawn into succession disputes. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Grain shipments from Egypt underpinned the food supply of the capital for centuries. Provincial elites acquired citizenship through military service and municipal charters. The silver content of the denarius declined steadily through the third century crisis.